A Globalized man
'Globalization' (or internationalization) has become a household vocabulary. It is among those that appear most prevalently in newspapers, heard most frequently on TV or radio, and most talked about by my peers. It seems that people enjoy using this word without knowing what it is, what it represents, or what we should do about it. While it dominates today's public consciousness, it looms in our mind like some kind of a disembodied spirit that we must come to a grip of.

Working with the International Relations Office of KAIST, I am probably one of those most exposed to this jargon, although I still do not understand why people like to use it so much. More often than not, I find myself fumbling for answers when I am asked to define 'globalization'. No definite answer, though I am much aware of what it represents. Well, that is something that they will find out themselves in a matter of time. A great deal of awareness has been created for 'globalization', but it is rather hard to pin down on in a single meaning. While it is perceived to be a prevailing attitude crucial for our country to gain global competitiveness, and to advance into group of developed countries, it seems to involve our everyday thoughts and behaviors, it is directly tied to our well-being.

Given that the 'globalization' concerns with the consciousness of the people, it must have something to do with our future self. Since they say that our future well-being hinges upon the degree of 'globalization' that has been achieved, I must speak for a positive aspect of one's personality.

What strikes me when I hear people talk of a 'globalized'(or internationalized) person is a man 'without prejudice' - an unquestioned man, I personally believe that an 'unprejudiced person' is a one who cares. He cares about people, about their happiness, and about what the world is up to. Since he cares, he must be warm-hearted, understanding, and with genuine interest in people. Put it differently, he is a man with curiosity-willing to learn about, to converse with, to learn from other people. He is usually generous and open-minded - open to the ideas and opinions of others and willing to share his. He listen to and talks to others with sincerity. He is attuned to what others can influence him as much as to what he can influence others. Yet, he possesses a capacity to be selective, a flexibility to discern what he needs to take from what he does not. After all, he has an ability to turn things around for the benefit of his
